early 20th century

The Maryland National Bank, one of the few commercial buildings in the otherwise residential town, is a handsome colonial revival building. The gable front is treated as if it were a classical pediment, while the doorway, with its arched fanlight, is topped by a large, broader pediment. Other classical details are the finely executed dentils along the cornice and pediment. All is not classical correctness, however, and the corbeled brick chimney adds a decorative note to the rooftop of the bank building.
